Goodbye message:

With regret, I announce that this is the last Weekly SafetyLit Update that will be released.

A major journal publisher has established a policy of restricting free online access to its journal article metadata that, in effect, makes indexing of their contents impossible. The maximum number of metadata imports (without full-text PDF files) appears to be about 10 items per hour. Beyond this threshold any further viewing of items from any of their articles is blocked until the next day. A single issue of one of their journals can contain more than 10 articles of relevance. The contents of more than 1600 journals of this publisher are tracked for inclusion in SafetyLit. Indeed, this publisher contributes the majority of new articles that are added to the database each week and that appear in the Update.

Over the past 6 weeks I have tried to reason with staff at several departments of this publisher and with technical support staff from the personal bibliographic management software program that the publisher owns. At first, I thought that I simply had not reached the person in authority who could approve permission for SafetyLit to have the level of access that had been offered for the past 25 years. Repeatedly, I have been referred from one department to another and the second then referring me to a third which refers me back to the first. Representatives have one thing in common--they seem aghast that I am requesting an exception to the new policy that restricts the quantity of metadata available for downloading.

The mission of SafetyLit is to provide in one place a comprehensive listing of new and existing publications relevant to injury prevention and safety promotion. Continuing SafetyLit without items from this publisher will mean that there are significant gaps. I don't believe that we can provide a service that is somewhat comprehensive but without journal articles from a single major publisher – the single source of the majority of SafetyLit contents. Alas, other than the SafetyLit database, the only other bibliographic databases that index injury-related contents from several of these journals are costly subscription services two of which are owned by this publisher.

The SafetyLit website will remain available indefinitely but without the daily addition of new content. The FAQ section of the website links to search strategies for PubMed and the WHO Global Index Medicus that may be modified to allow SafetyLit users to find articles in their areas of interest. See:
<https://www.safetylit.org/SafetyLit-PubMed.html>

SafetyLit receives daily updates from Google Scholar on several categories relevant to injury occurrence, prevention, and research. The search terms that have proved to provide relevant items without excessive unneeded listings are available at:

<https://www.safetylit.org/GScholar-Alert-Terms.html>

Against this gloomy announcement I offer my help to anyone who has an interest in sustaining SafetyLit as a freely available service. The server software is open-access. I will be pleased to provide training and support on the operation of the quite sophisticated programs that allow the tedious tasks of selectively indexing journal contents to be automated. The SafetyLit foundation administrative status can be transferred. Perhaps, someone with better fundraising skills can assume responsibility for this knowledge-sharing effort. I have been handling all of the administrative, technical, and bibliographic tasks alone for the past several years. I enjoyed the bibliographic component of the project--examining the online contents of hundreds of scholarly journals. I will miss that part of the work. It was a way to be engaged with progress in research and prevention. That I continued doing the same level of work after retirement that I did when compensated is evidence of my affection for SafetyLit. With funding to support a new leader and two, or perhaps three, staff. SafetyLit could be reenergized and successful but only if this essential publisher can be convinced to once again provide access.
